Mao's Cultural Revolution caused severe disruption to education for the majority of Chinese youth. Between 1965 and 1977, no entrance exams (Gaokao) for college admissions were held, and the overall state of education suffered in China, particularly impacting the non-elite students. During this period, Mao promoted a select group of college students, generally from peasants, soldiers, and

The CCP, however, retained a monopoly on political power, and the government forbade the creation of new political parties. The government officially recognized nine parties founded prior to 1949, and parties other than the CCP held 30 percent of the seats in the NPC. These non-CCP members did not function as a political opposition.
