Rhabdomyolysis - Wikipedia

Rhabdomyolysis is a condition in which muscle fibers break down and release their contents into the bloodstream. This can lead to kidney damage and other complications. It is often caused by trauma, such as a crush injury, or by strenuous exercise. Other causes include certain medications, infections, and genetic disorders. Symptoms include muscle pain, weakness, and dark urine. Treatment involves stopping the activity that caused the condition and providing supportive care, such as fluids and electrolyte replacement.
