Jamaicans for Justice (JFJ) have already begun working with children in the justice system and so it was natural for UNICEF to want to partner with them in our new country programme. To gain a better picture of what this two-year partnership hopes to achieve we sat down with JFJ advocacy manager Rodje Malcolm.

Looking out for children in the Jamaican justice system

'We want justice' is one of the most popular protest cries in Jamaica. And rightfully so. But while we value the system of justice, there are some shortfalls that limit that admiration. One of the main shortcomings is the productivity of judges in hearing and completing cases. There are, unbelievably, more than 400,000 cases in this category.
